OBSESSION

Angling for color

Artaic, a small mosaic company that designs custom mosaics then employ robots for quick assembly and turnaround, recently partnered with Artists for Humanity, a nonprofit youth arts enterprise in Boston, on a new mosaic design within the company's URBN collection. The pattern, Kaleidoscope Dream, was created by local teen Mardia Rosemary Rene. Her bold, op-art-inspired geometric comes in seven different colorways, and looks as eye-poppingly fabulous as the backdrop in a showstopping home bath as it does in commercial applications.

Modern interpretations

The Isabella Stewart Gardner heist remains one of the art world's greatest mysteries.

Now you can relive the drama thanks to artist Giovanni DeCunto. His new exhibit, "13," features interpretations of the lost masterpieces by Degas, Manet, and Rembrandt stolen in 1990.

The Lawrence native and Boston University grad learned his craft by visiting Boston museums and copying art on display. This technique worked: George H.W. Bush and David Ortiz have commissioned his paintings.

This exhibit features modern interpretations of Vermeer's "The Concert," Degas sketches, and Rembrandt seascape "The Storm on the Sea of Galilee," among others. They're on display through March 17 at his Boston gallery (116 South St.). Sorry, no $10 million reward for visiting.
